

Financial Education Initiative

Empowering girls through financial education since 2014

The Financial Education for Girls program aims to increase girls' awareness of their social and economic rights, and help girls build better futures for themselves through financial capabilities.

Aligned with the core business of Credit Suisse and our Financial Inclusion Initiative, the Financial Education for Girls program is delivered through our global partners; Plan International in Brazil and China, Room to Read in Tanzania, Teach for All Partners in Cambodia, Colombia and Uganda and Girl Rising in Ghana and Mexico. Aflatoun International is our curriculum and training support partner providing technical expertise in the area of financial and social education.

The program's aims are to ensure that:

- Over 150,000 girls receive Financial Education through Life Skills programs
- Girls demonstrate a measurable, positive change in knowledge, attitudes, and behaviors relating to financial literacy
- Educators' capacity to deliver high-quality financial and life skills education is increased (Partners will report on numbers as well as qualitative information)
- Families, community members and local authorities champion FE & life skills for girls

This work continues the positive work that support from Credit Suisse has been doing with its partners in their Global Education Initiative since 2008.

To date, over 140,000 girls have received financial education in 1,551 schools through programs run by Room to Read and Plan International, using Aflatoun International's financial and social education curriculum. The partners target girls who face poverty and gender discrimination in Brazil, China, Tanzania and Sri Lanka, as well as in India and Rwanda (2014-2017). In 2021 and 2022 two new partners have joined the Financial Education for Girls program: Teach for All, Credit Suisse's longstanding partner, will deliver financial education content to approximately 11,000 girls over the next three years in Cambodia, Colombia and Uganda through their network partners. Girl Rising also joins the partnership, working with local partners in Ghana and Mexico to bring financial education to over 20,000 girls by 2025.

Context

As a global financial institution, Credit Suisse sees first-hand how important financial skills are to enable people to actively participate in the economy and society. Financial education enables economic empowerment; many young people aged 14–25 in developing countries are already economically active but without a basic education in the key tenets of finance. They are, therefore, not only less likely to maximize the benefits from their economic activity, but also risk making decisions that may result in debt and further poverty over time and into adulthood. Girls in developing countries, in particular, face many more barriers to education compared with their male counterparts. Financial education can therefore be transformative for girls.

Here is what two girls say about the impact of learning about financial education

Mariana, Brazil

The project influences my life and helps me to be who I am. I want to be a cook and a pastry chef. I'd like to have a restaurant or a bakery.

Fatna, Tanzania

After joining this club, I learned how to seek out and acquire new spaces in markets, develop new business ideas and get new customers. All of these has lifted my spirits and showed me the untapped potential in running a business.

Partners: International experts delivering impactful programs together

Credit Suisse has chosen specialists to work closely together to deliver the overall aims of the Financial Education Initiative (FEI) program. Girl Rising, Plan International and Room to Read reach girls directly through their long-established gender-focused education and life skills programs; Teach for All focuses on development of the teaching profession whilst Aflatoun International provide technical expertise in financial education.

Aflatoun International is the technical expert in financial & social education, providing support in curriculum development, teacher training and monitoring and evaluation to the partners in-country either directly or through designated partners in their network. Aflatoun's curriculum provides the foundation for the work of all the partners in the FEI.
